Here and There

Abstract

This chapter studies various instances of the word there using comparative syntax, and argues that there is not itself intrinsically locative. In its locative uses, there occurs concurrently with an unpronounced noun PLACE (which is locative). Then (apparently) locative there can be assimilated to the evidently non-locative there of (archaic English) They spoke thereof, and similarly for Dutch and German, which have a very productive use of there + P. This chapter proposes that demonstrative here and there should not be thought of as locatives originating in a reduced relative clause. In fact, locative and non-locative there, when looked at from the right perspective, are both to be considered instances of demonstrative there.

The hosts of “Here and there” tell interesting facts about different countries. The stories are accompanied by pictures or videos. At the end of each video, viewers are asked to do a few tasks related to the lesson, such as matching pictures and words or completing sentences. Program “Here and there” is an excellent program, which will help you improve your grammar, speaking and listening skills. Here and There are two words in the English language that are used as adjectives in addition to the fact that they are indeclinable in nature. The word ‘here’ is used to point out the location of something as in the sentence “The book is here”. Here the word ‘here’ points out the location of the book. In the same way the word ‘there’ also can be used to point out the location of something as in the sentence “He lives there”, here the word ‘there’ points out the residing place of the person.
